

Midhurst to Miami: From Cottages to Condos

In 2003, Kate Fagalde was sailing round the Cape of Good Hope on the QE2 as an invited guest lecturer, when she got a rather unusual email from her long-suffering husband who had stayed behind in grey wet cold England. Don't bother to unpack when you get back - we're moving to Miami. Never one to turn down the offer of sunshine, Kate took it in her stride and as soon as she got back, they packed up the few possessions that they had brought to England three years before from their previous lives on an isolated farm in South Africa, and flew across the Atlantic to set up home in a high rise condominium just north of Miami. Suddenly their world changed from driving a farm truck on a single lane dirt track through seven gates to jockeying for position on the eight lane freeways of Florida in a car that wouldn't have fitted into their front room back in the UK. They had to learn the intricacies of cell phone operation instead of listening to the party line phone ringing on the wall of the farmhouse kitchen. Shopping in the local farm store changed to an exercise in choosing from forty different types of breakfast cereal, and forcing their way through aisles clogged with matronly women yelling into phones or yelling at the shelf packers. To say that it was a life-changing experience is an understatement, and in the following chapters, Kate takes a gentle but affectionate poke at some of the extraordinary situations that they found themselves in. After five years, Kate and her husband John no longer found it odd to drive on the right, pay half price for gas, cope with the threat of hurricanes or eat deep fried battered green beans. They attended clambakes on the beach, went camping with the alligators, they understood what aluminum was and worked out what an RV, an SUV and a HGV lane was. They will probably never understand American politics or the rules of American football, and they are still working out what the difference is between New York Strip and Tenderloin. But all in all, they enjoyed their time in Miami and if someone had arranged for Florida to have just a few mountains and a few less hurricanes, they might have felt a bit more at home.
