Not illustrated. 1887 edition. Excerpt: ...I shall call upon that young man, unless I get another despatch to-night. But I hear he wants nobody at his ruins. I suppose he has not asked even you to go there? No, sir; I think he took his little place here, because it would be so painful for him to receive any friends at that tumble-down castle. He has not yet been able to do any repairs. I respect him for that, said the Admiral, with his generous sympathies aroused; they have been a grand old family, though I cant say much for those I knew--except, of course, Mrs. Twemlow. But he may be a very fine young fellow, though a great deal too Frenchified, from all I hear. And why my friend Twemlow cold-shoulders him so is something of a mystery to me. Twemlow is generally a judicious man in things that have nothing to do with the Church. When it comes to that, he is very stiff-backed, as I have often had to tell him. Perhaps this young man is a Papist. His mother was, and she brought him up. I am sure I dont know, sir, answered Frank. I should think none the worse of him if he were, unless he allowed it to interfere with his proper respect for liberty. Liberty be hanged! cried the Admiral; and thats the proper end for most of those who prate about it, when they ought to be fighting for their Country. I shall sound him about that stuff to-morrow. If he is one of that lot, he wont come here with my good-will, I can assure him. What time is he generally to be found down there? He is right over Stubbards head, I believe, and yet friend Adam knows nothing about him. Nor even Mrs. Adam! I should have thought that worthy pair would have drawn any badger in the kingdom. I suppose the youth will see me, if I call. I dont want to go round that way for nothing.

I did want to have a quiet...
