Not illustrated. 1873 edition. Excerpt: ... were staying for a short time in this house--about four-and-twenty years ago, and whose names I am anxious to discover. Mademoiselle Dolfe elevated her black eyebrows to an almost hazardous extent. But, monsieur, four-and-twenty years ago! You imagine that I can recall visitors of four-and-twenty years ago? English visitors--and this hotel is three parts filled with English visitors every year from May to October. Thirty English visitors will sit down to day at our table dh6te, that is to say, English and American, all the same. It might be impossible to remember them unassisted; yet there are circumstances connected with these people which might recall them to you. But you have books in which visitors write their names? Yes, if it pleases them. They are even asked to write; but there is no law to compel them; there is no law to prevent them writing a false name. It is a mere formula. And if I can find the names, supposing you to know the exact date, how are we to identify them with the people you want? There are several names signed in the visitors-book every day in our busy season. People come and go so quickly. It is an impossibility which you ask, monsieur. I think if I had time for a quiet chat with you I might bring back the circumstances to your recollection. It is a very important matter--a matter which may seriously affect the happiness of a person very dear to me, or I would not trouble you. A person very dear to you! Your betrothed per haps, monsieur? inquired Mademoiselle Dolfe, with evident sympathy. Lucius felt that his cause was half won. Yes, madame, he said, my betrothed, whose mother was a native of your...
