Excerpt: ... VI. A Womans dress rustled in the adjoining room. Andrey shook himself, as though just waking up, and his face assumed the same expression that it had in Anna Pdvlovnas drawing-room. Pierre let his feet down from the sofa. The princess entered. She now wore another, a home dress, which was as elegant and fresh as the other. Prince Andrey rose, and politely pushed an armchair up for her. I often wonder, she said, as always, in French, hurriedly and cautiously seating herself in the armchair, why Annette has not married. How stupid you all are, messieurs, not to have married her. You will excuse me, you do not understand anything about women. What a debater you are, Monsieur Pierre. I have just been debating even with your husband; I cannot comprehend why he wants to go to the war, said Pierre, addressing the princess without the least embarrassment, though such embarrassment would have been only natural in the relations of a young man with a young woman. The princess shuddered. Pierres words apparently touched her to the quick. Ah, that is what I have been saying myself, she said. I do not understand, I positively fail to understand why men cannot live without war. Why do we women wish nothing, ask for nothing? Now you be my judge! I keep telling him: here he is his uncles adjutant, -- a most brilliant position. All know him well, and appreciate him so much. The other day I heard a lady at the Aprdksins ask: Cest fa le fameux Prince AndrS? Ma parole dhonneur! And she burst out laughing. He is weU received everywhere. He may easily be made aid-de-camp to the emperor. You know the emperor spoke very graciously to him. Annette and I have been saying that that might be done. What do you say? Pierre looked at Prince Andrey, and, noticing that this c...
