Includes: 15 Colored Illustrations and Biography [...]teacher had laughed at Absalom when he said that the Declaration of Independence was a treaty between the United States and England, and had asked him, Which country, do you think, hurrahed the loudest, Absalom, when that treaty was signed? And now this afternoon she as much as said Absaloms father should mind to his own business! It was growing serious. There had never been before a teacher at William Penn school-house who had not judiciously showed partiality to Absalom. And he used to be dummer yet [stupider even] than what he is now, thought Tillie, remembering vividly a school entertainment that had been given during her own first year at school, when Absalom, nine years old, had spoken his first piece. His pious Methodist grandmother had endeavored to teach him a little hymn to speak on the great occasion, while his frivolous aunt from the city of Lancaster had tried at the same time to teach him Bobby Shafto. New Canaan audiences were neither discriminating nor critical, but the assembly before which little Absalom had risen to speak his piece off, had found themselves confused when he told them that On Jordans bank the Baptist stands, Silver buckles on his knee.
